tocracy" in the form of William Horace Brown, of Chicago, who insinuates that Brown or son Howard's piece was suggested by his own orama, entitled "Coins and Coroneta." Here is what Mr. Brown says in a Chicago paper: "In the Summer of 1890 I wrote a play the motive of which was to show the criminal folly of American millionaires buying their way into the aristocracy of Europe. The central figure was an American of great wealth who had been twice married and who had a going and beautiful wife. He also had a daughter just entering society. The daughter was courted by a marquis, who negotiated for her hand osteosibly for the money she would bring him, but in reality he was fascinated by the heauty and charms of the virtuous young wife, whose ruin he hoped to accomplish. In the Summer of 1892 I sent the original manuscript of the finished play to R. A. Roberts, reader for Charles Frohman, on the request of the last-named gentleman, to whom I had effered it for examination. It was returned to me without comment, but I did not get it back until early in the following winter.
